Among the faithless, faithful only he." Some fifty years ago or more, a ship in the House by ten to ninety-three. sailed from Liverpool, with many passengers. Just after midnight, when little past the centre of the Atlantic, the Jupiter struck an ice island, causing her to settle almost instantly into the awful water. She was badly provided with boats, but such as they were, not hold all. Let those that are awake, save their lives! Let those that are sleep, pass to the sleep of death-was that terrific, but merciful decree. Sleep is but the precursor, the portal, the simile of the great enemy of life! There can be no pang in dying to the sweet and unconscious sleeper. So every wake pesron was summoned; every seeping person left to wake in an eternity The two boats were already over-crowded: the devoted ship fast sinking. Again the Captain went to forecastle, to steerage, to cabin and on deck; to see if one conscious passenger still was left unprovided for. Not one! "Push off your boats," was the solemn order. "But where's my sister? screamed a voice of despair from one of the boats; "I see her not, and I would die to | not charged. save her." "She sleeps, and I would not awake her.
